... considering the needs of rural Canadians?

Better understanding of the history of hemp assists with understanding how the centralization of political power through the long history of Globalized Neolithic Civilization became based on increasingly integrated and sophisticated slavery systems, which benefited those towards the top and center of those social pyramid systems, while screwing everyone else in proportion to the degree to which they were towards the bottom and periphery.

It was BECAUSE hemp is the single best plant for people, for food, fiber, fun and medicine, that for decade after decade laws became based on the Huge Lies that "marijuana was almost as bad as murder, since marijuana was falsely asserted to be an addictive narcotic that drove people insane and killed them."

The actual history of hemp in Canada started with that being an important crop, whose cultivation was subsidized and encouraged by governments. However, after Huge Lies regarding marijuana were popularized by the mass media as well as adopted by politicians, in the 1930s cannabis was completely criminalized, and so, cannabis cultivation in rural Canada was outlawed (while the government of Canada then paid compensation to the farmers that the government had originally subsidized, and so encouraged, after those farmers were forced out of what had suddenly become an illegal business.)

The first experimental industrial hemp crops were allowed in 1994, then the first re-legalized commercial hemp cultivation was allowed in 1998. However, that industry suffered from persisting consequences of the previous decades of complete criminalization. Moreover, the current kinds of bogus "legalization" are still based on compromises with the same old Huge Lies, rather than forthright admissions that the marijuana laws were always based on Huge Lies. Therefore, that kind of bogus "legalization" is NOT genuinely doing what it should do, which is return cannabis to being a better direct source of wealth for people living in rural areas. Rather, that kind of bogus "legalization" is still operating through the same slavery systems, whereby the urban areas have the political power to influence governments to develop ridiculously restrictive regulations, which end up actually perpetuating the class warfare, some of whose manifestations operate through the rural/urban split.

The Web site of Canadian Rural Revitalization Foundation (CRRF) www.crrf.ca featured a link to an article titled What's killing rural Canada <https://www.macleans.ca/killing-rural-canada/> ... while factually correct, such an article does not get remotely close to doing deeper analysis of the ways in which Canada is a small component of Globalized Neolithic Civilization, whereby similar patterns in similar social pyramid systems of power and privilege based upon governments enforcing frauds are found to be painfully obvious everywhere one examines.

That tragic trajectory provides no good grounds to expect that there actually will be any significant "Rural Revitalization." Rather, the vicious feedback spirals of the funding of the political processes are practically guaranteed in the foreseeable finite future to continue to enable enforced frauds to become about exponentially more fraudulent, one of the symptoms of which will surely be the on-going destruction of the quality of life of rural people.

Again, consider how the bogus "legalization" of cannabis in Canada was deliberately designed to end up with a few big corporations, owned by bigger corporations, controlling "Canadian" cannabis, as that newly "legalized" industry rapidly recapitulated the patterns of social facts everywhere else throughout the Canadian political economy. Hence, rural people in Canada are still grossly disadvantaged, while there are no solid reasons to expect that to ever be ameliorated. Hemp which should be a source of wealth for everyone, after decades of criminalization is being "legalized" in ways which will be a source of wealth for big corporations, that are definitely NOT owned or controlled by rural people.
